nants of volcanoes whose fires have long since died out. Approaching Honolulu by steamer from San Francisco, the traveler has the evidence of volcanic action thrust upon him in the first land he sees, by the ash cone of Koko head and the well preserved craters of Diamond head and the Punchbowl, which are in the outskirts of the city. The high mountains of the island of Oahu are also made up of black lava—basalt but they are largely covered with vegetation and one must go to the largest island of the group, Hawail, for the wonderful demonstration of the method by which all these island moun-tains have been built up from great ocean depths Kilauea, one of the most active, and Mauna Loa, one of the largest volcanoes in the world, are showing just how lava builds up mountains. Since the time of Captain Cook, the Hawailan islands have been visited by geologists and others interested in the problems of volcanoes and much been written concerning them. Recently the United States geological survey has taken up the investigation of the islands and is preparing topographic maps. In a professional paper, "Lavas of Hawaii and Their Relations," by

Whitman Cross, the survey is presenting a summary of what is now known concerning the lavas of all the islands. ONE-MILLIONTH INCH
